

Web 2.0, Just a Phase?

Contributed by Phil Youens
Wednesday, 16 January 2008

Web 2.0 is becoming known as the new way people use the internet, as more and more of these sites are designed its becoming clear that Web 2.0 is here to stay. Now Web 2.0 is a phrase most people use for the social networking sites, and all other newly developed sites aimed to offer simplicity, and stylish design concepts.

The idea behind these sites is for massive user interaction, whether it be sharing thoughts, videos, images, games, and thousands of more things. A lot of sites are popping up which offer users the ability to share their profile with millions of people, all around the world. With the sites offering everything at such ease it's why it has become so popular, even new people to computers can figure out how to interact with people all over the world now. This is the basis behind the phrase Web 2.0, it's a word to describe the beginning of how the internet will work for years to come, if I were you I would jump on the bandwagon and register with all the social network and bookmarking sites you possibly can. You are missing out on a whole new way to interact with friends, family, co-workers, and even people you don't know. If you're a website owner then it's time for you to start taking grasp of this new concept before the rush has slowed down. It's great for building up your traffic through free marketing, and advertising, you should give it a shot. Soon you will have no choice as everything will be working under the concepts of Web 2.0 design. If you don't know where to start registering I have compiled a short list of five great social networking sites that you should check out.

1. Facebook
2. MySpace
3. LinkedIn
4. Digg
5. Stumble Upon

The first three sites in this list out for networking with friends, family, and co-workers. You can create a profile to share with them all so they know what you like, dislike, etc. You can also easily communicate with everyone through these sites. They are already widely popular and have millions of users. The last two in the list are for gaining traffic, the idea behind them is this. You create a profile and submit your pages, you then network with friends to give your sites higher ranking in their systems. This can get your site noticed by millions, and can become a gold mine for you.